The purpose of this paper was to examine the handwriting behavior of children with pervasive developmental disorder through a pilot implementation of mainly jocular teaching methods which aimed, on the one hand, to the reinforcement of the childrenôs performance regarding the interconnected fields of fine motor skills and visual-motor coordination and, on the other hand, to the dealing and participation of the child in all of the activities. The experimental process took place in the city of Thessaloniki where 12 meetings were conducted in the participantôs house, two of which regarded the measurement of the pre-inspection and the post-inspection, and the rest the implementation of the specially designed teaching processes. In addition, a re-inspection of the participantôs performance was conducted six months after the implementation of the program. The fine motor skills and the visual-motor coordination were evaluated through the VMI test (Visual Motor Integration, Beery, Buktenica & Beery, 2010), while the examination of the visual-motor coordination was enhanced through the childôs performance in two pegboard-type tests with the use of both right and left hand in a defined time period. Finally, the performance of the handwriting behavior was evaluated through the copying of words in a specific period of time. During the analysis of the results it was established that the participant displayed significant improvement in all the measurements after the completion of the pilot program. In particular, the pegboard-type test stood out, since the participantôs performance in both measurements, both with the right and the left hand, appeared to have doubled. From the discussion of the results, it is inferred that the performance of children with autism in fine motor skills, visual-motor coordination and handwriting behavior, can be significantly improved and maintained through time, with the implementation of the appropriate educational programs.
